

British Army Regimental Succession of Titles: Artillery (forming the current regiments)

RA - Royal Artillery
RFA - Royal Field Artillery
RHA - Royal Horse Artillery
RGA - Royal Garrison Artillery

1716 - Though the use of artillery by English armies dates back to the Hundred Years War in the 14th Century, it was in 1716 that distinct Artillery and Sappers were established from the Ordnance Service.
1720 - The former was titled the 'Royal Artillery' in 1720 then the 'Royal Regiment of Artillery' in 1722.
1859 - The Horse Brigade Royal Horse Artillery was formed in 1859 to command all Horse Artillery batteries.
1862 - The Bengal, Bombay and Madras Horse Artilleries were transferred to the Royal Artillery.
1899 - The Royal Artillery was divided into two distinct branches in 1899: field (RFA, RHA) and garrison (RGA). The RGA included coast defence, position, heavy, siege and mountain artillery.
1901 - The brigade system was revived at the start of the 20th Century.
1924 - After World War I, the three artillery branches were merged back into a single regiment, though the RHA retained their separate badge and identity.
1938 - Before World War II, artillery brigades were redesignated as regiments.
1947 (Apr) - Almost all RA regiments and batteries (except RHA units) changed their number on this date. From this point onwards, numbers have also been unique, without the confusing duplication of unit numbers.

The Royal Regiment of Artillery is founded on batteries, which move between regiments.

This resource focuses on regular regiments. Territorial Army (TA) and Supplementary Reserve (SR) units are not included unless they became or were formed from regular regiments.

Some infantry, yeomanry and Royal Engineer units transferred to the Royal Artillery. Additionally, only regiments formed in or that served in the UK are included; i.e. not those in Malta, Africa or South East Asia.

Please also note that there have been numerous cases of the duplicate numbering of Brigades and Regiments.

A separate resource will explore the numerous regiments formed and disbanded during the Second World War.
